Pharaoh's Heart.

Lortet, Hugouenq and Renaut at the instance of the directors of the Louvre Museum, in Paris, which recently acquired four ancient bine enamel vases hermetically seeded said to contain the remains of the Egyptian King Ramees II., has led to the discovery that one of the vases contains the real heart of that Egytian sovereign—the Pharaob of the persecution of the Jews. In the other three vases were found bandages containing filaments supposed to be the remains of the viscera of the dead manarch, but the fourth contained a bony oblong object which a chemical examination made out as the heart of the accient Egyptian King. After over 3,000 years it is only natural that the organ should have become ossified, according to the professors. It is now in the shape of a medallion five inches by three in size, and pieces detached from it with a razor showed that it contained the same fibrous substance that composes the human heart. The King's tongue, somewhat similar in composition, is still to be observed in the mummy preserved in the Egyptian Museum at Cairo, so no doubt can be entertained as to the identity of the organ just discovered, Rameses II. died B.
